INFORMATION AND CULTURAL NOTES ON THE GROWING OF ORCHID PLANTS

The amateur can successfully grow healthy orchid plants and beautiful flowers in his own home or his own greenhouse by following the simple directions of orchid culture. There are many varieties that can be grown in the home and thousands of amaturs all over the country are taking up this fascinating hobby. While the condition of the average home is apt to be dry and more or less subject to drafts, orchid plants can be grown very well at home if the amateur will keep in mind the directions for temperature, humidity, ventilation, water and light. While growing plants in a small greenhouse is much more advisable they still can be grown successfully in the average home.

When only one or two plants are being grown at home these can be set in a metal tray filled with gravel and the plants set upon inverted pots on the tray. This tray should be partly filled with water and this method will greatly assist in keeping the air humid around the plants. The use of a fine mist spray on the foliage of the plants twice daily is required.

TEMPERATURE — The day time temperature should be more or less room temperature and the night temperature should be a little cooler. Whatever is best for the average human being is always best for orchid plants. Most varieties like it warmer by day and cooler by night, possibly a difference of 15 degrees. In the day a 60 to 75 degrees temperature is good. And in the summer as low as outside conditions will permit. A night heat of 55 to 60 degrees as a minimum on extreme cool nights and 60 degrees in moderate weather will be better for the plants than higher temperatures, especially if they are in bloom. In the summer temperatures often go up to 90 or 100 degrees, but the orchids won't mind as long as the air is kept humid and the leaves of the plants kept sprayed.

HUMIDITY — Humidity must be given to the plants at all time. This can be supplied by spraying the leaves of the plant daily or by keeping the plants in a metal tray as previously described. If the plants are being raised in a small greenhouse humidity can be raised by watering under the benches each day. Orchids want a fairly moist atmosphere which means a humidity of 70 degrees or more. Cattleyas love light overhead syringing several times a day especially on bright sunny days.

VENTILATION — Ventilation must be given to the plants at all times. Orchid plants must have fresh air and will not prosper in a stale or stuffy atmosphere. In hot weather the more ventilation given to the plants the better they will grow; however, ventilation is also required in cool weather. Do not place the plants in any direct drafts. A slightly open window away from the plants will give the desired ventilation. In a greenhouse fresh air must flow day and night especially from May to September. The air of the greenhouse must never be permitted to get stale or musty. A small crack of air will prevent this condition. The more air used, the more water will be required to maintain humidity.

WATERING — Watering must be adjusted to the individual desires of each orchid plant. Too much water is worse than not enough. When in doubt as to the amount of water that a certain plant requires the best procedure is to give the plant less water than too much. Normal watering is to completely water the plant once a week. For feeding we recommend any soluable 20-20-20 fertilizer — 1 tablespoon to a gallon of water twice a month.

It would be much safer to keep the roots of the plant on the dry side, especially in cool weather, than on the wet side. Saturating the whole pot should be done about every week; however, a fine spray should be used several times daily on the leaves. In the summertime they require at least three syringes on the leaves and in the winter one or two would be sufficient unless the air is unusually dry in the room or the greenhouse. In the winter water is best given to the plants in the morning so that the surplus will dry up before the cooler temperatures arrive at night. As a rule most orchid plants need a liberal supply of water. Newly potted plants should be watered sparingly for several weeks until the new roots are established. On cool, cloudy, winter days when temperatures are low, very little water is needed. All plants must be so placed as to allow all surplus water to drain off.

LIGHT — Orchid plants love plenty of indirect light. The morning sun is more helpful than the noon or mid-afternoon sun. Orchid plants live on sunshine, moisture and air. Too much light is indicated by scorched marks on the foliage. Too much shade will give your plants a beautiful dark green color, but no blooms. The most productive plants are those that are light green or yellowish green. When growing orchids in a greenhouse shading of the glass must be done from February to late October. Satisfactory results can also be obtained by shading with white lead and gasoline which should be applied just enough to exclude the direct rays of the sun. Cheese cloth stretched a few inches from the glass will provide heavier degrees of shading for those species which require it, such as Cypripediums.

POTTING — As a general rule for potting, all plants are usually divided and repotted immediately after blooming. A plant is generally repotted every two or three years. Many plants should not have their root action disturbed and should not be repotted every year.

Three general rules are:

1. When the compost decays.
2. When the plant does not thrive due to faulty drainage
3. When they have out-grown their pots.

(We recommend FIRBARK for potting)

All orchids should be potted very firmly using a sharp-pointed, hardwood stick and work the compost toward the center of the pot, packing it in as hard as possible. All potted plants should be kept dry. Syringing is most beneficial at this time. Watering of the roots should be delayed for about 5 or 6 weeks until the root action has started. The best potting material for Cattleyas is osmunda fiber; however, the new potting materials such as FIRBARK is also being used. The coarse osmunda fiber allows water and air to reach the roots of the plants. Adult plants of Cattleya Genera should not be watered until the fiber has become quite dry. The quickest way to kill plants of the Cattleya family is to over water them. Whenever in doubt the best procedure is a good syringing overhead or on the leaves instead of saturating the whole pot.

DISEASES — SNAILS and SLUGS are the worst pests. These pests do their work at night, especially during cool and rainy days. The Andrew Wilson Company of Springfield, New Jersey supplies many kinds of orchid sprays that will kill these pests. THRIP and SCALE can be controlled by using nicotine spray with soap added. WET-ROT is brought on by over-watering and can be detected by a semi-transparent appearance of the parts affected which soon become dark brown also the pseudo-bulbs will become black and very soft. It can be checked by avoiding water and setting the plants in a more airy position for a few days. Too much sun can be detected by scorched brown spots on the leaves. Any plant that becomes sickly or diseased should be isolated from the rest of the plants until the trouble is found.

The amateur can successfully grow healthy orchid plants and beautiful flowers in his own home or in his own greenhouse by following the simple directions of orchid culture. There are many varieties that can be grown in the home and thousands of amateurs all over the country are taking up this fascinating hobby. While the condition of the average home is not to be quickly and more or less subject to static, orchid plants can be grown very well at home if the amateur will keep in mind the directions for temperature, humidity, ventilation, water and light. While growing plants in a small greenhouse is much more advisable they can successfully in the average home.

When only one to two plants are being grown at home they can be set in a metal tray filled with gravel and the plants set upon inverted pots on the tray. This tray should be partly filled with water and this method will greatly assist in keeping the air around the plants. The use of a fine mist spray on the foliage of the plants twice daily is good. And in the summer as low as obtain conditions of 75 degrees. In the fall a 60 or 65 degrees temperature it matters by day and cooler by night, possibly a difference of 15 degrees is desirable.
